01 · Start here: Test 3, and how this episode works

Health Science 2. Test 3. Every short-answer question.

Hey. This is the Test 3 episode of the SAQ podcast for Health Science 2. It has one job: every written question Test 3 can ask you, answered the way she marks them, and the one-mark facts her quiz keys ask. One topic per track.

Where the questions come from. She doesn't post a list of test questions. In her own words, there is no such list. The closest thing, she says, is the module's learning checklist, because it limits what she may ask. So every point on her Module 3 checklist has a track here. It starts with her own signals. The two case studies she names for Test 3: Case 11, Pania's milk coming in, and Case L, Jack's hearing loss. Pedigree charts, because in her own words, printed on six of her quiz questions, pedigree charts will be tested in Test 3. And the topics on her help board: glaucoma and cataracts, conduction versus sensorineural deafness, and Huntington's. After that comes every question on her student-marked SAQ quiz, and the rest of her checklist. The answers are hers wherever she has posted one: her model answers, her decks, her quiz keys. Where her feedback and her own slides disagree, you'll hear which one to write, and where an answer isn't hers, you'll hear that too.

Quick facts. Test 3 is thirty-seven questions in sixty-five minutes, and about thirty per cent of the marks are written. That's roughly fifteen marks you write yourself. It closes on Monday the twenty-sixth of October. Check your own booked time on Canvas.

Her question verbs for this test, from her Assessment Overview: explain, analyse, apply, and demonstrate.

How she marks a written answer: about half a mark for each correct fact. So a four-mark question wants about eight short facts. Not a paragraph. A list, one fact per line, with the mark word in each line. Every answer in this episode comes to you in that shape.

How every track works. First you'll hear the question in a second voice, the way it might be printed. Then the hook: one line to hang the whole answer on. Then the answer, part by part, in the order you'd write it. Then the traps, where marks usually go missing. And last, the whole answer once more, in one breath. The final track, Rapid-fire, is every one of those one-breath answers back to back.

How to use it. The first time through, just let it play. Don't take notes. The second time, when the examiner asks for it once more at the end of a track, say your answer before I say mine. And when one feels shaky, loop that track. The player page can loop one track, or play each one twice before it moves on.

The order: the two cases first, then pedigrees, Huntington's, and glaucoma, because those are her own signals. Then the rest of genetics, the senses, and reproduction, each ending with its fine print: the one-mark facts, in her quiz keys' own words, that no written answer covers. And just before Rapid-fire, one more track of closed questions. Let's go.
